Sidel directly attacks the myths underpinning current public policies towards single mothers and argues instead that these women are "unsung heroines" who seek to raise their children and make ends meet in the face of enormous challenges. Her argument is based on in-depth interviews with no less than 50 women who have been single mothers at some point in their lives. The interviews were conducted between 2001 and 2003 in New York and the women came from a variety of ethnic, class, and age
